

The loss of the public airways to politicized, corporate interests is exemplified by Sinclair Broadcasting's blatant attempt to air propaganda and to mandate their affiliates to do so without commercials, no less.

That is an outrage.

The FCC, by the way, is not thought to be too helpful at present. The current political administration is probably pleased that Sinclair intends to broadcast propaganda. That said, those who run the FCC still have to take into consideration that the very viability of the US might be at stake if a perception develops that this year's election is stolen in a manner similar to the theft occurring in 2000.

What Mr. Bush sought to say in this respect was: "Fool me once, shame on you; fool me twice shame on me." Allowing Sinclair to air propaganda on publicly owned airways in advance of this year's election does not sit well with many. Count me among that number and do, please, "heed the call."
